Many industries require high quality optical inspection systems to be employed in the inspection of surfaces, structures, patterns, or components of optical devices. The optical inspection systems must be able to detect defects that might exist on optical devices in the submicron range. Examples of industries that rely heavily on high-quality inspection equipment are the semiconductor and flat panel display industries. It is in the manufacture of these industries that the application of the invention is expected to find greatest use. The inspection of optical devices in these industries has traditionally been done through the use of film, or electron beam (e-beam) imaging. With these techniques, a sample is placed on a sample table. The sample is then irradiated with photons (light) from an energy source such as a lamp or laser beam. The photons scatter off of the sample, creating an image of the sample. The image can then be viewed on a computer monitor or printed on a film. Defects in the sample can then be detected by an operator based on the image. In more sophisticated systems, the sample may be scanned with a focused beam of light, wherein scattered photons are captured by a detector which converts the photons to electrical signals that are in turn analyzed to produce an image of the sample. The beam may be scanned by, for example, a rotationally driven mirror. During inspection, defects can be classified according to their depth within the sample (depth-of-focus). If the depth-of-focus is large, then any defects that are located deep within the sample will be magnified, making them more visible to the operator. Defects that are located at the surface of the sample can appear blurred and will often be overlooked, as
