The binding of fibrinogen to thrombin and plasminogen is a rate-limiting step in blood coagulation. At the border zone of the cleavage in fibrin, the formation of a fibrin clot stops. We hypothesized that as clot formation continues, thrombin and plasmin bind progressively to fibrin as activity is released. We examined the spatial distribution of thrombin and plasmin in fibrin clots by a label-free, fluorescent method in a modified Thromboscope, measuring the change in fluorescence in microclots obtained by forming fibrin clots with the addition of exogenous radiolabelled fibrinogen. Fibrin monomer is known to inhibit thrombin and plasmin, and thus, the development of these enzymes into microclots was characterized using a titration of free fibrin monomer. Thrombin bound within the borders of the microclots, and binding occurred simultaneously. Plasmin was detected in the core of the microclots but did not bind significantly to fibrin until the clot had matured. Binding of thrombin increased at the border and tailed off as the core of the microclot began to form, indicating that the fibrin binds thrombin incrementally, with significant amounts of thrombin already bound to a region of fibrin before plasmin even appears in a clot.
