Category:Mobile software Category:ToshibaVision and Machine Learning in Computational Neuroscience. Vision is an inherently data-driven, top-down process that generates a vast amount of complex and spatially structured sensory information that is interpreted and eventually transformed in the brain's circuitry in order to perform multiscale computations. The ability to infer the underlying processes and constraints of the visual system holds tremendous promise for modeling vision and, ultimately, for therapies aimed at ameliorating visual impairment and promoting vision recovery. This review describes the major computational models that represent retinal spatial and temporal visual processing. We outline the tenets of computational neuroscience and describe the underlying computational principles of vision in the context of the two classic models for vision, the linear receptive field model and the processing-level models. We then focus on the recent proliferation of paradigms that use machine learning to model vision. While previous reviews focused on the toolbox and strategies available to the neuroscience community, the current review focuses on the key concepts and tools that these tools are based on and used to model vision. We describe the computational principles that underlie the capabilities of vision learning to model visual perception and describe the common practices, pitfalls, and open questions in using vision learning in the service of understanding visual perception and visual impairment.
